

international community sat back the massacre continued? In the movie, the international community seems to enjoy watching as the story unfolds. Moreover, if this was the case, then they would enjoy the drama of a long, drama of human massacre. For one hundred days when the massacre is taking place, not even a single voice is heard from the international community save for a journalist and Col. Oliver, the UN peacekeeping colonel. This may be a movie, a collection of documentation about the past, but it is a true depiction of how our structures are poorly established to carry out their missions.

It is interesting how one man, Paul Rusesabagina, assumes the role of human rights watchdog and offers refuge to fleeing people. In principle, the international human rights watchdog could do a better job than this one man does. The interesting story about the international human rights' laxity unveils as the movie progresses and violence worsens. In retrospect, there were thousands of UN peacekeeping troops in Kigali before the war broke out. They were there to oversee the implementation of the Arusha accord that sought to end the civil war in Rwanda (Carnegie Council for Ethics in International Affairs, 2009). After the war breaks out, the UN withdraws its troops from Kigali, leaving behind around 300 troops. In addition, the troops left behind do not seem to do anything to stop the massacre. To defend their non-involvement in keeping the peace, the UN colonel states that UN troops are 'peacekeepers,' not 'peacemakers.'

Hotel Rwanda' depicts clearly how tribal and ethnic infringes shaped the state of affairs in Rwanda during that time. For instance, a conversation taking place in a hotel bar throws weight on the issue of ethnicity. A journalist, in a bid to establish the cause of the genocide, interviews a Rwandan who confirms that there was strife between Hutus and Tutsis at that time. The Rwandan states that before colonization by Belgium, Hutus and Tutsis had cordial relationships void of social distinctions save for the economic distinctions that are prevalent in any community. However, the Rwandan in this conversation points out that the Belgian colonial rule created racial divisions between these two groups. Before the Belgian colonial rule, the Tutsis assumed the status of nobility while Hutus were the ordinary people. The Belgian rule, however, aggravated the divide between these two communities by favoring the Tutsis. The tribal and the ethnic chasm widened slowly under the Belgian colonial rule. Unfortunately, this divide did not cede with the attainment of independence.

The movie tackles the issue of the Rwandan genocide, and it is clear that this was not an 'internal issue' as some people may want to put it. In the course of the movie, it emerges that the French government had close links with the Hutus during the time of the massacre. Though these may be mere allegations, one cannot fail to note that France was the chief supplier of weapons to the Rwandan government. Actually, during the tenth anniversary of the massacre, the then Rwandan president impeached France the Cold War the nature of security challenges has changed radically and this change has been recognised by the UN governments and academics around the world The 911 attacks and the subsequent launch of the war on terror added a new dimension to this debate on the nature and utility of international law due to the demands from some quarters for a change in the laws governing self defence and humanitarian intervention This book analyses the nature of these debates and focuses on key issues that have led to the unprecedented contemporary questioning of both the utility and composition of international law on the use of force as well as the practicability of using force including handling of prisoners and security risks It also identifies the sources of division and addresses the capacities of security policy and international law to adapt to the changed international environment This book will of much interest to students of international law war and conflict studies and IR and Security Studies in general International Terrorism: A Compilation of U.N.
