priests became so quick and proficient in these sacrificial rituals, that they were often able to cleave the chest of the trembling victim and seize his frantically beating heart in their hands, before ripping it from his terror-stricken body and casting it down upon a pagan altar of bloody stones.

In some years as many as a hundred thousand human hearts were fed to the insatiable devil-gods of the Aztecs.

Dofia Martina told them that Quetzalcoatl's personal symbol had been a feathered serpent. Tradition warned Montezuma that he must fear that sign above all others, lest the feathered serpent destroy him in reprisal for his human sacrifices and blood lust.

"Little does Montezuma know," Padre Garza told his young friend Curco, "that his immoral empire will one day be replaced by an immortal empire. A symbol, but not one of hatred and revenge will destroy the Aztec Empire. The Holy Cross—the symbol of love and redemption, will defeat it. Whether we win or lose, here and now, is unimportant. Eventually, God will win His ageless battle with the devil. Someday the bodies and blood of human sacrifices will be replaced by the Body and Blood of Our Lord."

He looked down from his vantagepoint high up on the steps of the temple-pyramid, and saw an approaching column of marching soldiers and mounted men. Don Hernando Cortez and his men had returned from an encounter with the rebel Panfilo Narvaez. Some weeks before, Narvaez and a number of his followers had landed in the wake of Cortez and advanced on the Aztec capital. Their quest was not for God, but for gold. Now, Padre Garza saw Narvaez riding boldly along beside Cortez. Obviously, the Captain's powers of persuasion had converted yet another to his cause.

Far below his high perch, the foot soldiers halted and the riders dismounted, just as the sun sank behind the volcano of Popocatepetl. As if by magic, the blooming fields and gleaming buildings of Tenochtitlan were instantly bathed in a rosy glow.
