

Disinvited speaker says 'politics' to blame

Poet laureate replaced for Concord Academy commencement

By Nick Stiles

Concord Academy, N.H., poet laureate, Porsha Olajiwola, bonded with the students, inspired by their intellect and engagement.

When the private school reached out in January to invite her, the senior class had chosen her to speak at their graduation on May 24, she was thrilled.

But in early April, the school announced that a new reader — Alexandra Burton, a New York Times reporter and 1997 graduate — was

"I didn't have any proof as to why they removed me, but I had an educated guess."

PORSHA OLAIWOLA, who has returned poets criticizing Israel and supporting opposition for Palestinians under siege in Gaza.

Olajiwola said she didn't know she was no longer the regular until the Globe contacted her about it earlier this month and she checked the school's website to confirm.

"I didn't have any proof as to why they removed me, but I had an educated guess, which is my politics," Olajiwola said.

Olajiwola is active on X, formerly Twitter, and has reposted several poets criticizing Israel and expressing solidarity with Palestinians under siege in Gaza.

In late October, Olajiwola reposted a post that included a link

Columbia's president vows to fight antisemitism

Unlike other leaders, says she's grilling by Republicans

By Nicholas Fandos, Stephanie Saul, and Sheryl Ortner

The president of Columbia University said it had suspended 13 students. She promised that one visiting professor "will never work at Columbia again."

And when she was grilled over whether she would remove another professor from his leadership position, she appeared to make a decision right there on Capitol Hill. "I think I would, yes."

The president, Naomi Shafer, disclosed the disciplinary details, which are usually confidential, as part of an all-out effort Wednesday to persuade a House investigating committee that she is taking serious action to combat a wave of antisemitism following the start of the Israel-Hamas war.

In nearly four hours of testimony before the Republican-led Committee on Education and the Workforce, Shafer contended that Columbia had initially been overwhelmed by an outbreak of campus protests. But she said its leaders now agree that some had used antisemitic language and that certain contested phrases — like "from the river to the sea" — might incite violence.

"I promise you, from the messages I'm hearing

Suffolk County youths more likely to be held after arrest

Concerns raised about racial disparities

By Sean O'Leary

It can mean falling further behind on schoolwork, missing therapy appointments, or losing a part-time job. The consequences for youths who are detained after being arrested — rather than being released — are serious, and in Suffolk County, it's happening more often.

People under 18 in the county are nearly three times more likely to be held in state detention programs after arraignment than youths in the rest of Massachusetts, according to a new report from the state attorney's office said it is responding to a rising number of lawsuits naming young people while trying to balance how best to help children involved in crimes. But civil rights activists say the growing number of incarcerations between minors and the justice system reflects serious racial disparities and could have serious repercussions if youths end up reaching further down the wrong path.

In Suffolk County, which spans Boston, Chelsea, Revere, and Weymouth, 35 percent of young people who were arrested between July 2022 and June 2023 were held in Department of Youth Services detention programs, either because they could not make bail or because prosecutors moved to hold them without bail, according to data from the Massachusetts Trial Court. Statewide, 18 percent of youths were held after arraignment. With-out counting Suffolk, the number dropped to 12 percent, data for the same time period show.

Just over half of the youths held after arraignment in Suffolk were Black, and 5 percent were white, the data said, though census estimates say Black people make up about a quarter of the county's population. Black youths were held about 35 percent of the time there, while whites were held 22 percent of the time, according to the data for that 12-month period. The racial disparity is more stark statewide, with 18 percent of Black youths and 6 percent of white youths held.

The amount of time young people are detained can vary widely, from a day or two until a cash bail amount is submitted, to multiple months if the courts deem them dangerous. The median time statewide from July 2022 through June 2023 was 33 days, which rose from 32 the previous year and 31 the year before that, according to a state report. Statewide, almost one in four youths who are held after arraignment have a cash bail set but can't afford it, while the rest are held without bail.

One unasked question this approach to targeting youth crime.

"The idea that a young person goes in and gets arrested and then the research just doesn't back it up," said Levin Smith, executive director

Low-income areas want voice in greening of the grid

Often saddled with energy infrastructure, neighborhoods push back

By Sabrina Shankman

On a recent weekday afternoon, the American Legion playground in East Boston was a symphony of the sounds of spring: the crack of a bat during baseball practice, or the howls of a soccer field, laughter from parents chasing their toddlers.

But there was another sound, too: the shrill beep-beep-beep of a construction vehicle just across the street, as it chugged into the ground, building East Eagle Substation, a project by utility Eversource coming to fruition after years of neighborhood opposition and an overhauling vote in a mind-boggling ballot question to stop it.

Across the state, more often than not, energy infrastructure ends up in communities such as East Boston — so-called environmental justice neighborhoods, where the population on average is low-income, has a high percentage of people of color, and where a sizable number of households do not speak English very well, if at all.

Advocates worry environmental justice neighborhoods are being saddled with this infrastructure, taking away open space and exposing residents to risks such as fire,

INFRASTRUCTURE, Page A9

Nancy Rodriguez, a local organizer with GreenBoston, said the new East Boston substation is too close to a playground.
