

Economic Performance of Public Investments in Irrigation in India in the Last Three Decades

Introduction

The economic performance of Indian agriculture has been closely related to changes in agricultural productivity. Increases in agricultural productivity, in turn have been partly attributed to substantial increases in the irrigated area (Meizen-Dick and Rosegrant 2005; Gulati and Narayanan 2003; Vyas in Mundle et al. 2003; Pitman 2002). Agriculture accounts for over 80 % of consumptive water use in India (Pitman 2002), and is at times even recorded to be higher than 90 % (Amarasinghe et al. 2005; Meizen-Dick and Rosegrant 2005). The rise in the irrigated area came about with massive irrigation investments by the government, made with substantial support from the international donor community. These investments began in the 1960s and peaked in the 1980s, but in the early 1990s, public spending in agriculture slowed down and this translated into reduced spending in irrigation (Meizen-Dick and Rosegrant 2005; Gulati et al. 2005; Gulati and Narayanan 2003; Pitman 2002; Fan et al. 1999). Gross capital formation in agriculture declined from an average of 54 % in 1980-1981 to 26 % in 1999-2000 (Mundle et al. 2003). Support from multilateral and bilateral donor agencies also declined over the same period. However, there have been recent efforts to reverse this downward trend in investments in water-related infrastructure, including irrigation (Peacock et al. 2007; World Bank 2004).

The poor economic performance of many past irrigation projects in India may have contributed to the decline in irrigation investment and lending by international financial agencies in the 1990s (Meizen-Dick and Rosegrant 2005; Raja and Gulati 2005; Gulati et al. 2005; Pitman 2002; Jones 1995). Furthermore, the low rates of economic return may have also resulted in diminishing the poverty reduction impact of these irrigation projects (Meizen-Dick and Rosegrant 2005; Kikuchi et al. 2003; Rosegrant and Svendsen 1993). These findings, however, do not suggest that governments should stop investing in irrigation because of the poor economic performance of such projects. This paper shows instead that there are ways to improve economic performance and that governments need not choose between achieving food security (or objectives other than getting high economic returns from projects) and investing in economically unviable irrigation projects.
