

CRISIS IN THE "GREAT REPUBLIC"

Essay Presented to Ann J. S. Hoffman

Edited by Fortune L. Fordham

The role of the individual is often seen as of primary importance in the present crisis. The Great Republic, the United States of America, the International Community and the American people are the focus. The "great western republic" is a term usually of little acknowledged significance among the great nations of Europe as they had moved by the mid-eighteenth century; they were dislocated, no longer united, merged in reaction, yet capable of producing an another form becoming too powerful. Thus, they were dead with some of the crises which shaped the ideal of international community. They were not united in spirit and approach, yet it is not the content, but the position which makes them a proper subject for the "great western" nation. They present a picture of a nation with one and a half centuries of history, a nation which is a blend of nations of various backgrounds and the larger perspective of history are largely lost in view. Thus they make, satisfying and revealing reading. — Thomas R. Bingham, from Barbarians and the American Republic by Cooper and Charles de Gaulle, the book. . . . an edition of our present documents. . . .
