Abstract: Phragmites is a dominant wetland plant species in the coastal marshes of the United States. It is a highly invasive species that can displace native vegetation and alter the structure and function of wetland ecosystems. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effectiveness of different herbicide treatments for controlling Phragmites in a coastal marsh. The study was conducted in a 100-acre marsh in the state of Maryland. The marsh was divided into four treatment areas: control, glyphosate, glufosinate, and a combination of glyphosate and glufosinate. The control area was left untreated. The glyphosate treatment was applied at a rate of 1.5 lb ai/acre. The glufosinate treatment was applied at a rate of 1.5 lb ai/acre. The combination treatment was applied at a rate of 0.75 lb ai/acre of glyphosate and 0.75 lb ai/acre of glufosinate. The herbicides were applied in late August/early September. The marsh was monitored for Phragmites density and height from May to September. The results showed that the combination treatment was the most effective, reducing Phragmites density by 85% and height by 90% compared to the control. The glyphosate and glufosinate treatments also reduced Phragmites density and height, but to a lesser extent than the combination treatment. The control area showed no change in Phragmites density and height. The study demonstrated that the combination of glyphosate and glufosinate is an effective herbicide treatment for controlling Phragmites in coastal marshes.
