Abstract

The development of Spoken English in Pakistani teachers training institutions working in public sector has never been assessed. This study explores the extent of improvement in English speaking skills among prospective teachers of one year teacher education program at three public sector universities in Punjab, Pakistan, where English is the medium of instruction, like all other public sector universities in Pakistan. The sample for this study consisted of 206 prospective teachers (131 entry and 75 graduation levels). The unequal number of prospective teachers at entry and graduation level was due to difference in intake. The prospective teachers were called one by one and were assessed using the Fairfax County Rating Scale. The data were analyzed quantitatively. It was concluded that no significant improvement occurs in the English speaking skills of the prospective teachers during the teacher education program offered in departments of Education working in the public sector universities.

Introduction

Language is a system of arbitrary symbols for human beings' communication (Knight, 1992). English being the official language occupies an important position in Pakistan (Khushi & Talat, 2011). This is also the language of teacher education in Pakistan (Rahman, 2006). A language has four basic skills: reading, writing, listening and speaking. Learning a language needs to learn these four basic skills. Learning in Pakistani universities is assessment driven (Ali et al. 2009). Instead of assessing four basic skills only writing skills are assessed in the public sector educational institutions including universities in Pakistan (Alam, 2012; Coleman, 2010). The assessment of writing skills alone gives high grades and students work hard for mastery in writing excellent pieces. English Speaking Skills (ESS) have rarely been assessed. That is why students do not pay attention to English speaking skills. Consequently, the level of English speaking proficiency is very low in outgoing graduates of higher education in Pakistan (Alam, 2012; Bilal et al. 2013; Coleman, 2010; Shafraz et al. 2011). Not to talk about the weak students even bright students who get high scores in written examinations are unable to speak English language properly (Bilal et al., 2013; Karim, 2012). Speaking skills empower human to create new ways of speaking to others about any topic or experience (Honig, 2007; Huang, 2012; Wu, 2012). To speak fluently, correctly with proper
