major special events and identifies some of the strategic issues that have emerged in special events management since the terrorist attacks of September 11 2001 The thesis focuses on the subjective and objective components of the systems currently used by the Department of Homeland Security and the FBI to categorize and resource special events and it evaluates whether the current approach to major event planning is sufficient for contemporary counterterrorism challenges The thesis considers how changes in the present system may improve interagency counterterrorism preparedness Finally it applies risk management principles to the interagency special event planning process to determine if these principles are useful for developing a rational politically defensible and fiscally responsible approach to federal resource allocation for
