Over the past few years the Soviet studies world has enjoyed a bumper crop of new writings on the USSR's policy in the developing world. The increased interest in an area that was, for some time, the province of a relative handful of specialists undoubtedly reflects the central place that Soviet actions in the Third World occupied in the Reagan administration's foreign policy and the extraordinary changes that have taken place, more recently, in Moscow's approach to East and South Asia, the Middle East, Africa, and Latin America.

The dynamic developments in Moscow's policy in the Third World under Gorbachev raise numerous questions, the broadest of which may be characterized simply as "whither Gorbachev?" To what ends have the remarkable changes—among them Moscow's withdrawal from Afghanistan, the Soviets' contribution to the settlement of other regional conflicts, and their diplomatic overtures to former "pariah states" like Israel, South Korea, and South Africa—taken place? Do these shifts indicate funda-
